

The Motorcity Mouth

Front Page

Weekly Columns ▼ Politics World News Trending

Saturday, May 24th, 2025

Kwame Kilpatrick Enters Crowded 2025 Detroit Mayoral Election, Promises a Second Chance 'For All Of Us'

DETROIT — Former Detroit mayor, federal inmate, and philanderer-in-general, Kwame Kilpatrick, has officially entered his bid for mayor in the upcoming 2025 election.

"If redemption is real, then so is my candidacy," he said, speaking before a modest crowd outside the Coleman A. Young Municipal Center on Sunday afternoon.

Flanked by several local pastors, wife Carlita Patrick, and a sound system reformed public servant, spent much of his campaign kickoff speech underscoring the concept of "spiritual parole," calling his time in prison "divine internship." He cited his founding of two Bible study groups, a prison-wide recycling initiative, and his work teaching a financial literacy class—titled From Restitution to Reinvestment—as proof of his "rehabilitative excellence."

9 Way To Spot a Suburbanite In Detroit

With Detroit growing in popularity and Summertime right around the corner, it's the time of year when rented from a pawn shop, Kilpatrick appeared energized, confident, and unbothered by the 24 felony convictions that once derailed his career.

"Prison taught me a lot," Kilpatrick said. "Like how to lead from the inside, how to forgive the justice system, and how to properly fill out a resume without lying."

With Mayor Mike Duggan stepping aside to pursue an independent bid for governor, the mayoral race has been left wide open, and Kilpatrick's reentry is poised to complicate what was expected to be an already chaotic race.

His chief rival, City Council President Mary Sheffield, responded to Kilpatrick's announcement by pivoting her own messaging: "No shade, but I too have made mistakes. Once drove 49 in a 35." Later tweeting, "Just keeping it 100."

Another candidate, longtime city fixture Ray Jenkins, launched a TikTok campaign hours later with a social media post recounting a youthful incident involving unreturned Blockbuster tapes and the hashtag, "#FelonyEnergy."

Kilpatrick, now a self-described faithleader and

"God gave me a vision," Kilpatrick said. "And that vision was Detroit. Again."

Despite objections from ethics watchdogs and people who remember things, Kilpatrick's campaign has quickly gained momentum on social media, receiving endorsements from an eclectic roster of controversial supporters, including the former New York Governor Andrew Cuomo, rapper Boosie Badazz and the felonious dynamo herself, Martha Stewart.

"He did his time." Stewart tweeted: "Now let him cook!"

While critics have raised questions about the legality of his run, Kilpatrick insists he is fully within his rights and cites Donald Trump's 2024 conviction and subsequent successful campaign to the presidency as inspiration.

"If a felon can run for president, surely I can run this city again—especially since I still remember the Wi-Fi password at City Hall. And also I promise not to steal any money this time."

suburbanites crawl out of their rural structures and swarm upon the city like the invasive species they are. It's not their fault that they are the way they are - they're hard wired this way. Nonetheless, here in the city, it's important to take proper precautions, including knowing what a suburbanite is and how to spot one. That's why we've compiled this list of 9 sure ways to spot a suburbanite in Detroit.

1. They ride the QLine. And they post about it.

"This is so European!" They declare while traveling three blocks in 11 minutes. They treat the people mover like it's Disneyland and not a suspended, metal metaphor for their life: Going nowhere in air conditioned comfort.

Continued on page 3T...

The Detroit Grand Prix FAQ

Every year, like your check engine light, the Detroit Grand Prix returns to remind us that the city of Detroit belongs to speed. For one weekend, downtown is transformed into a combustion runway. Indy cars scream past shuttered buildings, residents rerouted like cattle...

So, if you've found yourself wondering, "Can I walk through my own city during this?" we've got you covered!

Detroit Grand Prix FAQ: Frequently Avoided Questions

Q: When is the Grand Prix this year?

A: Officially, May 30th-June 1st, however locals know the Grand Prix begins the moment the first traffic cone is hurled into the Detroit River by a shirtless man named Rick who claims to be "part of the crew."

Q: What exactly is the Detroit Grand Prix?

A: No one is entirely sure, but what we do know is that it's an annual event where race cars zip through downtown at 180 mph, while the people who live there wait 40 minutes for a bus that never comes.

Q: Can I still access Belle Isle during the Grand Prix?

Q: Why is this good for Detroit?

A: It's not! But someone named Brad from GM marketing will say it is, which is basically the same thing. Think of it in terms of trickle-down economics: they race, we watch from behind a fence, the city gets "exposure."

Q: Is this event family-friendly?

A: Yes! If your family enjoys heatstroke, engine noise, and paying $9 for a can of Red Bull while being funneled through a maze of nonsense, then this is the event for you! It's like a county fair for people who miss the sound of war.

Q: How do I get around the city during race weekend?

A: You don't. The Detroit Grand Prix is not just a race—it's a break from your regular, dependable, convenient routes! Some alternative suggested modes of travel include kayak, zipline, and astral projection.

Q: Are there environmental concerns?

A: No, because they were paved over.

Q: What should I wear to the Grand Prix?

A: Only spiritually. Please meditate on past visits and accept temporary loss of public space. Any attempt to cross the bridge will be met by corporate volunteers who will sell you a $20 beer ticket and a sense of unwelcome.

Q: What does the event cost taxpayers?

A: Silence. We don't talk about it.

A: Something that says, "I care about horsepower more than housing."

Q: Can I protest the event?

A: Absolutely! Please report to the designated "Freedom of Speech Zone" located between the Porta Potty and the smoking section, behind the Monster Energy display.

Hillary Clinton: "Fuck it!" Announces 2028 Election Bid From Backstage of Fleetwood Mac Reunion Tour

Detroit, Michigan - In a move that has sent panic (and perhaps a gentle, knowing chuckle) across the political landscape, former First Lady, Senator, Secretary of State, and two-time almost-President Hillary Rodham Clinton has reportedly declared her intention to seek the nation's highest office once more. The announcement, sources say, came during a spirited backstage rendition of "Don't Stop" at the Fleetwood Mac reunion tour in Detroit.

"She just threw her hands up in the air, mid-air-guitar solo, and yelled, 'You know what? Fuck it! I'm doing it,'" recounted a slightly bewildered roadie who wished to remain anonymous. "Stevie Nicks just nodded sagely, like it was the most natural thing in the world. Then she asked if anyone had seen her tambourine."

The news comes as a surprise to absolutely no one. After decades in the public eye, numerous "I'm not running" pronouncements, and a political career that

Holy Shit Discovered

The Vatican – An ancient shit discovered this week is believed to be the last bowel movement of Jesus Christ. Currently encased in a special temperature controlled, bullet-proof glass box in reads like a dramatic historical fiction novel, Clinton's re-entry into the presidential fray was less a thunderbolt and more a familiar creak in the floorboards of American politics.

Sources close to the Clinton camp indicate that the 2028 campaign slogan is currently being work-shopped. Early contenders include: "Third Time's the Charm (Maybe?)", "Still Here, Still Fighting (Still?)", and the edgier "Let's Just Get Her Out Of The Way Already, yeah?"

Political analysts are already having a field day. "This changes absolutely nothing," commented Dr. Eleanor Vance, a professor of Political Science at the University of Bupkiss Online. "We've reached a point where the possibility of a Hillary Clinton presidential run is a constant, a fundamental law of the political universe, like gravity or the persistent rumor of a new Guns N' Roses album."

The Republican National Committee, meanwhile, issued a press release consisting of a four and a half minute soundbite of nothing but laughter.

The small, but persistent Hillary camp flouted several campaign directives and slogans when asked by news media groups. Among those possibilities, "sensible shoes for all," a renewed commitment to "emails, probably," or even a promise to finally reveal the location of "that missing server, possibly," during a televised séance.

The Democratic party's reaction has been a mixture of weary resignation and recognition. "Look, on the one hand," sighed one Democratic official. "On the other hand, at least we know what to expect. It's like ordering your usual at a diner – you know it's not going to be the most exciting thing on the menu, but it's reliable. Ish."

As the nation braces itself for another cycle of Clintonian intrigue, one thing remains certain: the 2028 election just got a lot more familiar. And isn't that comforting?

the Vatican, ancient texts led archaeologists to the location of what is being called the greatest archaeological discovery since the tomb of Egypt's King Tutankhamen was uncovered in 1922 by archaeologist Howard Carter.

Biologists at the University of Oxford, Cambridge, say they've analyzed the newest addition to the Catholic Churches trove of sacred relics and determined the actual meal served at the last supper. Researchers discovered trace evidence of a clam chowder soup, petite filet mignon, with bread sticks from the Olive Garden.

The shit is remarkably preserved,

Continued on page 2W...

Harris Addresses Detroit Crowd, Unveils New Plan for Black Men: "Just, Like, Really, Really Be Yourself, You Know?"

Detroit, MI - Vice President Kamala Harris took to a makeshift podium in downtown Detroit, addressing an assembled crowd with a speech that seemed to materialize from the ether, apropos of absolutely nothing. "I've been practicing this all week," she announced, her voice echoing slightly off the surrounding buildings, "and I'm, like, super ready to share my... insights."

The crowd, a mix of curious locals and bewildered tourists, seemed unimpressed by the spectacle, shifting uncomfortably as Harris launched into a series of vaguely motivational phrases. "We're talking about... possibilities," she declared, her hands tracing abstract shapes in the air. "And, you know, the thing about possibilities is... they're like, possible."

Harris unveiled her "new plan for Black men," a policy initiative that had reportedly been in development for "a while, like, a really long while."

"My plan," she began, her voice dropping to a dramatic whisper, "is for Black men to... just, really, really be themselves, you know? Like, authentically. Because, that's, like, super important."

One attendee, a local barber named Tyrone, told The Detroit Ped: "I mean, I'm already me. What else am I supposed to be? A dolphin?"

Avoid Heatstroke & Handcuffs: 9 Ways to Beat the Heat This Summer

If you follow these 9 Summer Hacks for staying cool this year and still end up behind bars? Well, you probably have bigger problems than the seasonal heat - things like gripping the bar soap just right, or finding a decent lawyer on wages like yours.

The plan involved a series of vague directives, including: "Embrace your essence," "Find your inner you," and "Just, like, vibe, man." The vice president also emphasized the importance of "self-care," which she clarified meant "like, you know, doing things that make you feel good, like, maybe getting a massage, or eating a really good sandwich."

Continued on page 2P...

Read This Article

🏠 Front Page