Missus Mary Say: On Bosses What Ain't Got Brains and Leeches What Ain't Got Legs

Missus Mary Say: On Bosses What Ain't Got Brains and Leeches What Ain't Got Legs

Well now, ain't this just a pair of pitiful tales landed on my doorstep? Honestly, the gall of some folks to even put pen to paper with such nonsense. Makes a body wonder if they got any gumption at all.

First up, we got a sorry soul calling themselves a "Ms. Mildred McMillan" from somewhere or other – probably a place with more dust bunnies than sense, if you ask me. Seems pore Mildred's got herself tangled up in a workplace run by what she delicately calls "inept management." Inept! Honey, if they're paying you, you ain't got no right to be calling folks names, 'specially the ones signing your meager little checks.

"Missus Mary," she bleats, "the decisions are illogical, communication is nonexistent, and morale is lower than a snake's belly in a snowstorm!" Lawsy, Mildred, you make it sound like they're forcing you to eat dirt and bark like a dog all day. Newsflash, buttercup: work ain't supposed to be a picnic in the park with singing unicorns. It's called work for a reason. You go there, you do what they tell you, and you collect your pennies.

My advice? Stop your caterwauling and start looking out for Number One – that's you, in case your head's too full of complaints to remember. Instead of whining about "illogical decisions," figure out how to make 'em work for you. Nonexistent communication? Perfect! Means nobody's breathing down your neck. Low morale?

Even better! Less competition for that one decent stapler in the office.

Honestly, some folks just ain't got the sense the good Lord gave a goose. You think I got to where I am by fretting about every little bump in the road? No, sir! I saw an opportunity, I grabbed it with both hands and I climbed right over anyone too busy crying about the rungs being wobbly.

Now, for the second driveling dilemma. A "Mr. Bartholomew Butters is apparently plagued by someone in his life who "constantly requires transportation." This leech, this...this automotive barnacle as I'd call 'em, seems to think Mr. Buttercup's personal chariot is some kind of free taxi service.

"Missus Mary," Bartholomew whines, "it's become incessant! Every errand, every social engagement, every time they have a hankering for a pickle at three in the morning, it's 'Bartholomew, can you give me a ride?' My gas bills are astronomical, and my patience is thinner than a dime thats been flattened by a train!"

Oh, boo-hoo, Bartholomew. Your gas bills are high? Try walking for once! It's good for the figure and builds character. As for this freeloader, you've let 'em get away with it, haven't you? You've been too ascared to just say "No!" Well, let me spell it out for you, simpleton: N. O. No! It's a two-letter word,. Even someone as spineless as you ought to be able to manage it.

Next time this human-shaped vacuum cleaner asks for a ride, tell 'em your car sprouted wings and flew to Reno for a poker tournament. Tell 'em you joined a traveling yak-herd. Tell 'em anything! Just stop enabling this lazybones.

Honestly, the nerve of some people. Expecting the world to cater to their every whim. They ain't got the sense to manage their own lives, let alone offer any worthwhile contribution to society. Now, go on, get out of my sight with your troubles. Maybe try solving them yourselves for once.
